FINE HISTORICAL PAGEANT GIVEN BY NEWTOWN PUPILS

31 Students Graduate Last Evening; Pageant, Speeches and Music Presented

GIVEN IN FIVE EPISODES

Junior and Senior Classes Depict Scenes from Early History of Borough

NEWTOWN, June 15.—The contribution of the Newtown Junior and Senior High Schools to this borough's anniversary week, marking 250 years since Newtown was founded, was in the form of a historical pageant, and was presented yesterday afternoon and last evening in Arcade Hall.

The staging of the pageant last night was in connection with the graduation exercises of the Class of 1934 of the high school, when 31 seniors received diplomas from C. Willard Shuster, supervising principal.

Historical figures of such renown as William Penn and George Washington, as well as early settlers of the borough, came into being during the pageant presentations, and added their bit of information to historic lore of the section.

The material for the pageant which was given in commemoration of the founding of Newtown by William Penn in 1684, was taken from papers of the Bucks County Historical Society, from David's history of Bucks County, and from research work done during the past four years in the senior economics classes. The pageant was written by Miss Dorothy Stickle, a member of the faculty.

The prologue and epilogue were given by Lloyd Williams; and during the two programs explanatory dialogues by Evan T. Worthington, Gilbert Cobb, Robert Kenderdine, Lewis Stannard, Mary Hillborn and Margaret Fillmore, added much to the piece, the large audiences thus being kept informed of data included in the scenes and other things closely related.

There were five episodes with the first three including two scenes. The costumes and scenery were in true accord with the times depicted, and all characters were well impersonated.

Episode one, the founding of Newtown, in scene one, showed the granting of the charter to William Penn for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in payment of the debt owed by England to Penn's father. The scene was laid in the privy council chamber of His Majesty, Charles II, in London. The characters shown were: Charles II, Jack Ogeby; secretary to the King, James Cooper; servant to the King, Harry Shields; members of the council: Raymond Goodman, Harry Tomlinson, Elmer Pownall, John Huber, Horace Tranter; William Penn, Lloyd Williams.

A morning visit between William Penn and Thomas Holme, surveyor, in the Spring of 1684, near the Newshammy Creek, was brought to view in the second scene. Penn congratulated Holme (Harry Bendell), upon the splendid manner in which he had surveyed the land about the New Town, Shadrack Walley, one of the first landowners (Wayne Ely), also conversed with the two, as Penn told that he was weary of the bustle of Philadelphia, and desired to settle a new township. Many of the early settlers were mentioned as the tracts were gone over.

Episode two (Revolutionary War period, 1774-1776), in scene one, brought out the meeting at Court Inn (building at corner of Center avenue and Court street), at which Judge Hicks presided on July 9, 1774. Judge Hicks was impersonated by James Cooper; William Walters by Edward Stankowski; Henry Kirkbride, Harry Bendell; Stapler, Joseph Rutherford; Stapler's sympathizers, John Morris, Winfield Hofmeister, Harry Need, Thomas Sutton; James Wallace, Elmer Pownall; John Kidd, Samuel Wiggins; John Hart, Robert Cahill; John Wilkinson, Jack Hart; Samuel Fouke, Thomas Zagorski; Thomas Jenks, William Clevensline; Richard Walker, David Bond; Joshua Anderson, Charles Huber; Benjamin Fell, Harry Tomlinson.

Washington's visit to this borough on December 29, 1776, when he stayed at the home of the Widow Harris (present owner, Warren Custer), interested the spectators, in scene two. The participants: General Washington, Francis Sutton; aide-de-camp Baylor, Charles Cassar; officer, Clayton Steacker; Lord Stirling, John Janney; General Cadwalader, John Burns; Hessian officers—F. Scheffer, Lt. colonel, Benjamin Sherman; Klein-schmidt, ensign, Gerald Scott; F. Fischer, Lt. of artillery, Merle Hughes. This scene had a most touching close with the officers shown kneeling in prayer as the songs of worship of the soldiers in nearby quarters was heard.

The robbery of the county treasurer, which was at one time located here, was shown in episode three. In the first scene the Doan brothers, outlaws, and their pals, were shown awaiting the time to enter the house of Treasurer Hart, and in the second scene the Hart family was shown as they

NEWSPAPERMAN DONS SILK "TOPPER" AND SUCCESSFULLY CRASHES DOORS OF THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE

Blodstreams of Business Flow Through From More Remote Corners of the Globe and Streams Are More Numerous — Trade in More Than 5,500 Different Stocks

(Note: "No visitors" is the rule in the London Stock Exchange, but H. R. Knickerbocker, star foreign correspondent of International News Service, wanted to see the workings of that body so he donned a silk "topper" and crashed the doors—successfully. In the third article of his series on British recovery Knickerbocker tells how business is booming at a great rate on the London Exchange.—I. N. S.)

By H. R. Knickerbocker
(I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)

LONDON, June 15.—(INS)—Hatless, coatless, collarless, shirtless, the bruised and indignant body of a gentleman who had been well dressed a few minutes before was propelled into Throgmorton street.

"Come again," jeered a swarm of other gentlemen in morning coats. "And bring your grandmother next time," added one of them.

The gentlemen in morning coats were stockbrokers. The gentleman on the pavement of Throgmorton street had just paid them an unauthorized visit on the floor of the London Stock Exchange. He picked himself up and departed, glad to have retained at least his trousers.

That is what happens to visitors, to any strangers who, ill-advised, attempt to violate the sacred precincts of that ancient and exclusive body of traders. Their first rule is no admittance. Their second rule is the him's rush for any who violate rule number one.

The bruised and indignant gentleman was the last stranger but one to visit the floor of the exchange. The last visitor was your correspondent.

For in an investigation into British recovery one essential starting point is the London Stock Exchange. The history of economic depression and of economic recovery gives a leading role to the stock market. They are the first to scent the trend of business. Their nose for the way business is going to go points the way long before business has taken it.

To all this my friends, the stock brokers in the partners' room of one of the oldest London firms agree. But their view on the desirability of piloting a stranger through the Exchange were not unanimous.

"You will be spotted at once," said an elderly broker.

"You don't look like a member and you don't look like a clerk," said another.

"When they spot you they will yell 'Louisville,'" said a third. "And then they will surround you and dance a war dance, and then tear your clothes off and throw you into the street. And if one of us has been seen with you we will be hauled up before the committee and disciplined. You see it's not like your New York Exchange. There isn't any visitors' gallery and there is no such thing as getting permission to go through and it does you no good to have a friendly broker with you."

"Never mind," exclaimed a fourth. He was young and he was Irish. "Come on. Here, try this topper."

He handed me a top hat. It was too small. It balanced precariously. The next effect was to make the wearer look like a comedy hooper.

"Fine," exclaimed the Irish broker. "You'll do. Stick close to me. We will talk business to each other. Don't stare about. At the door we rush right in. Don't even look at the guards."

Down a long gloomy lane we hastened, emerged on Throgmorton street, and dived through the swinging doors in the red granite face of the institution which has been the home and barometer of crises and recoveries since modern business was born.

"Four thousand members," muttered my companion as we brushed past the guards and were suddenly overwhelmed with the chatter of a thousand voices.

Light streamed down dimly from a huge dome. It streamed on a vast concourse of men, mostly young or middle-aged, only a few old ones, but all ruddy-faced, healthy looking, and seemingly possessed of great sociability. They stood about in groups and appeared to be exchanging anecdotes.

Their leisure is perhaps only apparent, but the fact is that a broker in Throgmorton street can frequently cable, execute and receive confirmation of a transaction in New York quicker than he can get the same sort of transaction done in his own Exchange. Three minutes from the time of cabling New York to the time of receiving confirmation of execution is no unusual record.

One or two brokers eyed my topper curiously. We made haste. There were at least 1,000 men on the floor, but it was a quiet day. They may have been smilingly reflecting on their profits, for as one journal has expressed it "good news has been so frequent it is almost a bore."

Since June 1932 the value of 365 representative stocks on the London Exchange has increased $6,500,000,000. That is certainly a smiling matter.

Here on this very spot, explained my companion as we crossed the center of the floor, was the financial heart of the world. Maybe New York would have a reply to that. But the bloodstreams of business flow through this place from more remote corners of the globe and the streams are more numerous.

Here they trade in more than 5,500 different stocks and bonds officially listed, and in another 3,500 unofficially listed, a total of nearly 9,000 issues of every conceivable variety, and from every cranny on earth. When the London Exchange is looking up it means that a good part of the world is looking up. Every day the Exchange publishes a list of its securities in two newspaper-size journals, and the daily list runs to thirty-two pages. New York's total stock and bond transactions, including the Curb can normally be contained on five newspaper pages with a listing of a maximum of around 2,500 issues.

Dignified gentlemen around the Consol market ignored us as we pushed past them to the Kaffirs, African shares. We passed the Indians and the Dominions, redolent of Empire. We skirted the special post for rubber stocks, tea and coffee, oil, foreign stocks and bonds, electric, shipping and so on, twenty-eight great categories in all.

All of them, or practically all, are looking up. They have been looking up and climbing for the last two years. No wonder the brokers seemed in good spirits. Long before the index of business activity showed a genuine rise in Britain the Stock Exchange had sensed the rise, anticipated it, and now the brokers are enjoying the proof of the pudding by eating it.

Until the late Autumn of 1932 business in Britain was still wallowing in the bottom of the trough. But in June 1932 the market began to rise. The index for industrial shares rose steadily from a point just above fifty per cent. of the level of 1928 to a point which is today around 90 per cent. of that boom level.

We hurried along. Brokers jostled us. We jostled back, intently looking for somebody and hoping that nobody would look for us. We were conscious of the right this company had to exclude strangers. For the London Stock Exchange is a strictly private concern, a joint stock company itself. It is in a sense, engaged in business for profit, and it makes a profit. It made a larger profit last year than ever since the boom year 1928-29. It is paying now its old top level dividend of $65 a share, and its shares, available only to members, have risen in value from $675 in 1932 to $1,400 today, a pretty good index of British recovery.

Paul Hovgard Qualifies For "Caterpillar Club"

An aviator who formerly resided in Elgely, has qualified as a member of the famous "Caterpillar Club." Paul E. Hovgard, now of Philadelphia, being forced to "bail out" when a plane he was testing near Buffalo fell in pieces yesterday.

Hovgard, who has for the past several months resided in Philadelphia, suffered a fracture of the arm when he used his parachute as a means of escape when the plane fell to pieces after several hours of trial flying. He states that it was one of the pieces which broke his arm. The test flight was being made at Curtiss Field, Buffalo.

A Bucks County young woman, Ann Lauer, 22, of 17 E. Clymer avenue, Sellersville, was forced down in a what month at Norristown. Her plane developed motor trouble, but she was able to safely land the craft. Before it rolled to a halt, the plane struck a rut and the undercarriage was smashed.

SUBMIT REPORT ON SCHOOL LIBRARY

Morrisville Pupils Find Volumes Real Factor in Progress

MANY ARE CONSULTED

MORRISVILLE, June 15.—In an interesting report of the library of the Robert Morris School recently filed with the school board it is shown that on many days the circulation reached the 100 mark. During the first month of school the daily average was only 47 but it has increased each month.

The librarian in her report states that considering the fact that there are 600 students in the Robert Morris Building and that most of the students use the library during study periods and do not need to withdraw books for further use, it would seem that the above circulation figures indicate that the library is a very real factor in the life of the school.

The library does not close until 4:30 o'clock and the number of students using this time either for reference of recreational reading, or for withdrawal of books, has been steadily increasing.

Since September nearly 450 books have been classified, shelf-listed, catalogued and prepared for the shelves. This number includes new books, duplicates and many older volumes which had not been previously catalogued. There were 70 new books of fiction obtained a few months ago.

The report further states that the use of pamphlets, clippings and pictures depends a great deal on the size of the collection and type of material gathered, that is whether its supplements the course of study and whether the various teachers find need for it in their class work. The collection is small at the present time but with growth will become more and more useful.

Pictures are needed for illustrative material in class work and for bulletin boards. The collection is obtained from papers, duplicate magazines and old books that are about to be destroyed. The library club has been working on the gathering of pictures as a project.

The number of reference questions that the librarian must help and direct students with during a given day is large. Work of this sort is particularly heavy with the history, social sciences, English and health departments. It is with this type of work that the librarian has the opportunity to come in contact with students and give individual instruction in the use of the library—the kind of instruction which is the most effective.

Formal library instruction was planned for the 7th, 8th and 9th grades this year. The work for the 7th and 8th grades has been completed. Four lessons to each of the three sections of each of these grades were given during regularly assigned English periods.

ALBERT GOLDMAN WINS A PRIZE FOR WRITING BEST ESSAY

Is Awarded $10 by Mothers' Association of Public Schools

CLASS NIGHT IS HELD

Unique Program is Presented By Class of 1934 Before Large Audience

A unique class night program for the graduates of 1934, Bristol High School, featured the presentation of "Seniors at the Bar", in the high school auditorium last evening.

The seniors, fighting for the diploma they claimed they had earned after 12 years of hard work, appealed to the court for their "rights," and were rewarded in having a verdict returned in their favor.

Woven into the program were the usual prophesy, last will and testament, the class poem and song, as well as the presentations. Music was another feature of the evening, and awards were presented by the president of the Mothers' Association.

The court "case" was presented after a welcome was extended by William Armstrong, president of the class.

The prologue was ably handled by Miss Vivian Green, and then the three scenes unfolded. Scene one showed the exterior of Bristol high school, with the worried seniors outwardly showing their concern over bestowal of the coveted diplomas.

In the second scene, that of the court room, the plaintiffs said their diplomas were being withheld by members of the faculty who claimed the said seniors did not have sufficient credits to graduate.

The Judge was Albert Goldman, while the two attorneys were: William Armstrong, for the plaintiffs, and Wayne Fry for the defense. The sheriff was Richard H. Winslow, Jr.; and the clerk, Herman Smith. Antonio V. DiMico proved a first class heckler. Witnesses for the class of 1934 were the Misses Phyllis Kallenback and Dorothy C. Bair and Edward Monaco. Miss Bair told of the many accomplishments of her classmates, while Mr. Monaco gave the historical record of the class while on the witness stand. Those witnessing for the defense were: David Hertzler, Ralph Bilderback; Miss Rachel Bartine, who maintained the mental conditions of the seniors was below par, Garnetta Herman; Warren P. Snyder, H. Richard Hubbard.

An affidavit by the registrar of the school, proving that sufficient credits had been secured by the students, saved the day; and their was great jubilation when the jurors made their return in favor of the class. Spectators were other members of the class.

The last scene showed the school campus with the graduates all gathered. Here the prophesy was presented by Sara McGerr, and the last will and testament by Clarence Smith. At the conclusion of the class poem by Francis Clay the entire class sang the class song, music for which was composed by Albert Goldman, with words by Wayne Fry and Richard Hubbard.

The winner in the essay contest, prize for which is awarded by the Mothers' Association annually, went to Albert Goldman. The presentation of the gift of $10 was made by Mrs. Harry Pope, president of the association. Mrs. Pope also presented to nine graduates of the class of 1933, and eight of the class of 1934 "Rambler" staff pins.

To their senior advisors, Miss Evelyn Thomas, and Elton Bird, the seniors presented gifts in appreciation of their aid during their period in high school.

The Bristol high school orchestra provided numbers; and other selections included: Tuba solo, Philip Workman; and trumpet solos, Leonard Herman.

The class officers are: President, William Armstrong; vice president, Victor Rockhill; secretary, Phyllis Kallenback; treasurer, Howard Lovett.

EASING THE BURDEN

Business is the principal beneficiary under the decision of congress and the postoffice department not to continue after July 1 the higher scale of postal rates for advertising matter which went into effect two years ago. Nor is it likely that the postoffice budget will suffer.

This rate increase, which ranged from 1/2 to 3 cents per pound, has been an unnecessary burden on business at a time when business could ill afford to carry even necessary burdens. While direct-mail advertising is in a sense a competitor of newspaper advertising the newspapers have opposed the taxing out of business of the direct mail advertiser. That which hurts one business hurts all business.

Now that congress and the postoffice administration have taken a step in the right direction and established another precedent they should go the whole way and bring back the 2-cent rate for first-class mail. The 3-cent rate has virtually driven the direct-mail advertiser out of this class of mail users, with untold loss of revenue to the postoffice and great injury to business in general.

In little ways such as these the national government can speed the return of normal business conditions. They put the little fellow back in business on a paying basis and it is through him that big business must look for the restoration of normal buying power. A postal system within the reach of all is more important than a balanced postal budget.

FREE SPEECH UPHOLD

To the American Legion the country is indebted for an interesting test of the right of free speech and the right of an organization to curb free speech among its members. The case is unique and adds a new chapter to the history of America's fight for free speech; a fight begun in Colonial times and destined to continue as long as it is human nature to repress and to force one's will upon others.

This particular attempt at suppression of opinion and its public expression was made by the American Legion of New York state which was displeased with the action of a member post. The state encampment revoked the post's charter because it had violated a national rule by adopting a resolution conflicting with the policy of the national convention. The post officially opposed the bonus after the national convention had sponsored it.

Fortunately for the Legion, the state supreme court ruled that the state encampment went beyond its powers. No institution in America could long survive such an arbitrary abrogation of the right of freedom of speech and opinion. The courts have saved the Legion from a disastrous split in its ranks.

There is nothing unusual in the fact that it had not occurred to the Legion that its action was inconsistent with its declaration to uphold the constitution. Organizations, like individuals, constantly violate their own precepts.

"MA CINDERELLA" by Harold Bell Wright

CHAPTER XXXIII

"And now that you have succeeded in placing Ma Cinderella in her proper environment, what do you propose to do next?" Belden went on.
The girl answered moodily, "I am returning to New York tomorrow."
"Hum-m—yes. I think that is best. Will you see the young man before you go?"
"That would spoil everything, wouldn't it? John Herbert's loyalty to his mother, his feeling of obligation to her—for all she has done for him—until she changes her views somewhat. Besides—" she paused.
"Besides what, Diane?"
"We promised each other we would wait until his mother learns how wrong she is."
"Right, dear, quite right. You'd better go back to New York at once. Just leave everything to me."

Diane leaned toward him eagerly, and her eyes were shining, her cheeks glowing. "You are going to help, Uncle Jim? You will be a friend to Ann Haskel—and John Herbert? You will help them and—and me?"

The old lawyer lifted his white head with judicial dignity and, making a desperate effort to hold a professional pose, answered, deliberately:

"As your attorney, young woman, I must still advise you against your scheme. It is fantastic, irregular, impractical, and dangerous. As an old friend of your father's I sympathize with the spirit of your undertaking and can understand your point of view. As a bachelor of many years I am intrigued with—ah—certain aspects of the case. My duty to you compels me to advise caution, while my long acquaintance with Judge Shannon, who raised this boy, inclines me to suspect that the last of the Haskels is a gentleman of quality. And so, my dear girl, for reasons not strictly legal, but none the less sound, I shall do what I can."

But Diane did not go to New York the following day, as she had planned.

For almost the first time in her life Bill Carroll's daughter found difficulty in carrying out a decision. Day after day she put off going away. She knew she ought not to remain. She had told Mr. Belden definitely that she was going. Often she took herself sternly to task, and as often neglected to do that which her judgment told her was best.

Then one day she stepped from the elevator at the fifth floor of the hotel where she was staying, to find herself face to face with two of her Wilderness Lodge friends—her hostess at the Lodge, Mrs. Jones-Williams, and Sally McBride, another of the younger married-divorced-and-re-married set.

There were exclamations of mutual surprise, hilarious greetings, a confusion of excited questions and ejaculations; the elevators went up and down and the two Wilderness Club ladies accompanied Diane to her rooms.

"Whatever are you doing here?"

"We supposed you were safely back in your beloved New York."

"I'm simply perishing for a drink."

"We've been shopping for hours and hours."

"Dropped in here at George Selwin's for first aid."

"The rotter wasn't in."

"Beastly luck."

"I'm simply perishing."

"Sorry," said Diane, "but I haven't a thing. I have been held here on business about the estate. I'm leaving for New York in the morning."

"Of course you wouldn't have anything on your hip?"

"But why are you living in this dump?"

"Yes, why aren't you in your own home?"

Diane explained lamely: "Why, you see, I have been expecting every day to leave for the East. The hotel seemed easier. I'm taking Wilson with me—that is, I mean, he will come as soon as he closes things up, you know."

"Hub! You sound damn phoney to me." "I suppose you know what happened right after you left the wilderness."

Diane succeeded more or less in ejaculating the proper surprise.
Mrs. Jones-Williams eyed her artist friend suspiciously. "Don't suppose you have seen them?"
"No, of course not," returned Diane, properly indignant.
"Hub! You might at that; you certainly saw enough of the young gentleman in his native wilds." "I say! What a lark to hunt the old she-moonshiner up and take her around a bit. You know, show her the sights, give her the key to the city." "I don't imagine she's even so much as ridden on a street car in all her life." "She could teach our city bootleggers a trick or two at that." "Where do you suppose they're hiding out?" "Some queer dump." "I'll tell you what. Let's throw a party for her—you know, the old Cinderella

"I'll tell you what, let's throw a party for her—you know, the old Cinderella motif." "Grand! It's an inspiration!"

"motif." "Grand! It's an inspiration!"

Diane tried in vain to change the subject. They were defirous with their brilliant idea. They shrieked with laughter in anticipation of the fun to be had out of the backwoods woman. They complained that the town was dead. They must do something to wake things up, or perish. They would start a season with a Wilderness Club ball, with, as they put it, "Ann Haskel, in her Ma Cinderella act." They would pass the word, quietly, of course, that they had captured a genuine female moonshiner hill-billy. What a stunt! It would be the sensation of the season.

When Diane had finally seen her vivacious callers into the elevator, she returned to her rooms with a heavy heart.

"What," she asked herself, desperately—"what could she do?"

How could she manage to thwart the inconsiderate and cruel plans of these reckless devotees to thrill and kick and punch and wallop?

What if these irresponsible seekers after excitement should find the Haskels, now, in Diane's old home? If they did, Ann and her son would be sure to discover the trick Diane had played on them. Then what?

The artist squirmed as she recalled the raging she had endured at the Lodge because of her friendship with John Herbert, following as it did, that night which they had spent together in the woods. The Lodge crowd had shown no excess of delicacy in expressing their interest in Ann Haskel's son, and their views had been modern in the extreme. The girl grew cold, now, at the thought of what they would believe and say if they should discover this development of her backwoods summer affair, as they called it. For her to attempt an explanation would be hopeless. They were as incapable of understanding her motives and the nature of her friendship with John Herbert as she was incapable of the sort of thing with which they charged her. As to how Ann Haskel and John Herbert would react to her uninvited and secret interest in their affairs she dared not even try to imagine.

Diane Carroll had known before she left the Ozarks that what John Herbert thought of her was the most wonderful and quite the most important thing in her life. And she was as happily sure of his thoughts of her as if he had spoken them. But Diane knew, too, that day when Ann Haskel had warned her to "let her son alone," that there was no hope for herself and John Herbert as long as the mountain woman believed her to be "just one of that no-count, tridin', cain't-raisin' Lodge crowd."

She had been so happy over the success of her plan and in picturing John Herbert living in her old home. She had felt so sure that in such environment the mountain woman's conception of life, and the values which she had so contemptuously placed upon the work of writers and artists, would be changed. It was impossible, now, for the girl to go away to New York and calmly await developments. In an agony of uneasiness and anxiety she stayed on. Repeatedly she told herself that if the threatening crash should come it would be better for her to be away. But she felt that no matter what happened, she must be at hand.

How many times she was tempted to see John Herbert, and explain. Frequently she drove past her old home. Once she caught a glimpse of Ann and Nance.

Then it happened.

Six of the Wilderness Club cohorts fell upon the artist with excited cries of triumph.

"No wonder you didn't go back to New York!" "Been held here by business of the state, Phoeey!"

"I'll say she's been held by business." "Thought you could put one over on us, did you?"

"What dy' mean stealin' our Cinderella stuff an' keepin' the fun all to yourself?"

Diane asked, desperately: "What on earth are you crazy bats raving about? What's the joke?"

"Joke!" they shouted, with jeering laughter. "Would you listen to her!"

"Yeah, the nerve of some people." "Yeah, the nerve of fairy godmothers, you mean!"

Newspaperman Crashes Doors of Stock Exchange

to business. But the $130,000 that a New York seat costs today has no parallel in London. There it is an entrance fee of $3,000, an annual subscription of $500, the cost of the purchase of the seat of a deceased or retiring member, about $4,500, and the cost of the minimum three shares in the Exchange, or $840, a total cost of not more than $8,900.

It is certain that the London brokers average at least the $40,000 a year profit ascribed to New York brokers by Mr. Ferdinand Pecora, but it is certain that nobody will ever know the exact figure because Parliament has never emulated the interest of Congress in the workings of the strongholds of capitalism.

enough to make them smile like cats that have been eating cream. Once my topper nearly fell off and it seemed to me that the smile of one broker showed a faint tendency to become tigerish. My companion and I had a bad moment. We recovered the hat. With one glance backwards at the crowd of maneaters of their prey we dashed through the swinging doors. The trip had been as successful as British recovery itself.
The Stock Exchange has certainly come back. It isn't booming. It is simply moving along like an English country squire jogging home to what? To real prosperity? Does the Stock Exchange really reflect the state of business? The next article will attempt an answer.
